

SUPPLY CHAIN MANAGEMENT MATURITY

Capability maturity models (CMM) are a common method for assessing the state of a business process.

Most maturity assessments are conducted by specialist consulting firms and provide a structured, external perspective.

AO's ability to quantify like-mindedness enables those running a process, those participating in that process, and those paying for it, to learn their internal alignment around its state. These stakeholder's opinions can be interpreted to determine where the process lies on a four or five tier maturity curve – and where misalignment exists around the level of maturity.

Applications include a national logistics company whose procurement function measured their internal alignment, and compared it with their executives and their peer departments in operations, finance, engineering, and other groups.

The alignment measurement identified where the executives, logistics staff and their peers shared the same view of procurement's maturity, and where procurement's leadership needed to understand and reconcile misaligned judgments of its maturity.
